

Have any of you ever taken a class that incorporated all of your interests into it?

Was the whole reason for your science career wrapped in a bow?

If not, don't feel too bad; instead be envious of me. This last week I started taking a class called Engineering 130: Energy Society and the Environment. Assuming I apply myself, which I will, this class will offer me a key to my career path. The class goes over how energy is produced, stored, and consumed. Additionally, the course considers the socio-economic implications.

Consequently, I will use this class to really draw out what I plan to do for the rest of my life. I will gladly analyze what types of energy are used today. I will also figure out which of these energy systems are most beneficial and which ones are most problematic.
